Photographer, Julia Noni, known for capturing motion in her work, shot the campaign featuring a beautiful range of watches and cinematographer, Htat Htut, filmed footage showcasing people wearing their Movado watches as they move throughout their daily life activities. The shoot took place on the Upper West Side of Manhattan, capturing historical landmarks such as the renowned Movado Time Sculpture designed by celebrated architect Philip Johnson, which is prominently displayed at Lincoln Center as a donation from the brand.

“We spent a lot of time researching our archives and diving deep into our heritage to define the elements that have made Movado an iconic and legacy brand since 1881,” said Margot Grinberg, President of the Movado Brand and SVP of E-Commerce. “One of the key differentiators of Movado is our museum dial. It was considered revolutionary. A watch designed with no numbers wasn’t heard of at the time. It’s a design just as relevant today as it was over 75 years ago and continues to be our primary inspiration for how we continue to evolve as a brand.”

The new campaign takes its inspiration from Movado’s iconic Museum Dial, whose single dot at 12 o’clock symbolizes the sun at high noon. The campaign also features for the first time, the new Movado logo, which was inspired by a Movado logo from the early 20th century.
